

After 2012 ... What?—The Art of Reality Creation

“The gods anesthetize those they are planning to destroy, they don’t send them high-level Big Picture teachers.”
--T.D. Hall

“Reality is, here on earth, agreement as to what is.” --L. Ron Hubbard

As you know, the Mayan calendar ends at 2012. What happens in 2012 and after? “No problem,” my irrepressible inner jokester replies, “we’re on the Julian calendar!”

My inner jokester aside, there are a great many indicators suggesting the next few years are going to present big, big challenges to our species. Many remote viewers, I’m told by Val Valerian [trufax.org], report that they see nothing on Earth after 2012 except sand. Not long ago, the aborigines of Australia said their good-byes to life on Earth. The Hopi elders tell us that we’re no longer in the 11th hour, but in the midst of prophesied chaos. These are just a few of the alarming indicators. Among people in general there is a growing uneasiness about the future. More and more are asking, “Are we standing at the threshold of Doom?”

My Prediction

I am what is called an “intellectual historian,” i.e., one who tracks ideas. Why bother tracking ideas? Because what we regard as our day-to-day reality is an expression of ideas. Ideas = implicate order; day-to-day reality = explicate order. It’s really important to know this. If many indicators are telling us that our day-to-day reality is heading right toward a cliff, we should take heed and the necessary thing—change our thinking....

Discard the beliefs and belief systems that are leading us along the road to disaster, and adopt beliefs and belief systems that will put us on what the Native Americans call the “red road”—the road of health and well-being.

How to do this? It helps to know that ... personal destiny is a product of personal consciousness, i.e., personal destiny is self-determined. Likewise, collective destiny is collective-self-determined. As the collective consensus goes, so goes the collective history.

Changing a collective consciousness requires, first and foremost, a change in personal consciousness. What one monkey knows, other monkeys can learn. When the proverbial hundred monkeys learn the new thing, all monkeys learn—automatically, as it were. Why? It's a holographic universe. Whatever one comes to know, all can know.

This monkey, for one, is not in agreement with the doom & gloom consensus. My prediction is that yes, there will be major geological and socio-political changes in the next four to ten years, and that no, we and our beautiful planet will not be destroyed. I predict further that out of the whirlwind of change, the human species will emerge a fully mature species--intellectually, emotionally and spiritually mature.

My optimism as to the future is based on both objective and subjective information....

On the Objective Side ...

*The work of Dr. David Hawkins (Power vs Force) indicates that our species has evolved markedly in the past few decades, from the consciousness/attitude called “pride” to the consciousness/attitude called “courage.” We are still a long ways off from attaining Christ consciousness (the top of Hawkins’ scale), but, nevertheless, progress is being made.

*The work of Dr. Bruce Lipton demonstrates that evolution is “all about” increasing intelligence, meaning increasing intelligence reception/processing capability, i.e., consciousness. Consider the amount of data you process on a daily basis compared with the amount of data processed daily by, say, your grandparents. Any increase? Many factors are behind the increase, the most obvious technical factor being the Internet.

*Here is a short list of very interesting entities (in alphabetical order):

Bashar (channeled by Darryl Anka); Itzhak Bentov; Michael Cremo David Hawkins; Bruce Lipton; Robert Monroe; Ramtha the Enlightened One (channeled by J.Z. Knight); Zecharia Sitchin. What do these entities have in common?—other than the fact they speak to us in the contemporary period.

Each of the above, in his own way, provides us with a fascinating perspective on the “Big Picture.” The pieces of the puzzle we call Life are, at last, coming together. The fact that so many Big Picture teachers (there are many others in addition to the above) have appeared in the past fifty years or so is a very, very good sign, indicating that our species is ready for a quantum leap in consciousness. “When the student is ready,” it is said, “the teacher appears.”

On the Subjective Side ...

I've done directed dreaming for a long time, and along the way, I've had dozens of dreams of Earth beyond 2012. Before getting into specifics, allow me a few words about the interpretation of dreams....

It used to be that the ability to interpret dreams was highly regarded. In ancient times, a fellow by the name of Joseph interpreted a dream of an Egyptian pharaoh. The pharaoh liked the interpretation, acted upon it, and gave Joseph a high office in the administration. Today, in the tail-end days of the dominance of materialism, the Josephs of our world are generally ignored and dreams are dismissed as fitful expressions of over-excited neurons.

One of the very few scientists to buck the materialistic consensus was Sigmund Freud, whose psychotherapeutic practice necessitated that he come to terms with the dream phenomenon. The literary result was the classic The Interpretation of Dreams (1921). There are many observations of great value in this book, such as the point that the most important element in a dream may be the one that seems most unimportant; but Freud's major thesis, the dreams represent wish-fulfillment, is not at all satisfactory.

Since the sixties, when I first read Freud's theory, I have kept notes on my dreams. Readers who have read certain of my other writings, such as "Lucid Dreaming/Lucid Living" (on this section of the site), will rightly suppose that were I to write up a theory of dreams and dream interpretation, I would argue that dreams represent the current state of our consciousness, and involve important inputs from the Holodex, the universal data bank.

In the eighties, I learned how to fully explicate dreams, drawing upon the Dianetics procedures developed by L. Ron Hubbard (Dianetics—The Modern Science of Mental Health) and other procedures. In one Dianetics session, in which I was the subject, I tracked a childhood nightmare back to my original creation, where I saw, quite vividly, myself and a countless number of others shot forth in beams of light from what appeared to be the surface of the sun, or a sun. (Dianetics, by the way, can be learned by anyone through careful reading of the above-cited book. One need not join Scientology.)

In addition to the "wish-fulfillment" dream, there are many other types of dreams. To name a few (categorized on the basis of underlying intent): Dream of warning, teaching dream, confrontation of fear/anxiety dream, resolution of issue(s) dream, encouragement dream, dream of invention or discovery, and so forth.

Whatever the specific intents behind dreams, the general bottom-line intent appears to be the same—to mentor. I am so certain of this, I call my dream-maker "The Mentor."

I hope that I've said enough about the dream-works to convince you that dreams offer important guidance. And so it is, after a rather lengthy introduction, I state my thesis: On the basis of my dreams, I can say (with personal certainty) that humanity has a future on planet Earth after 2012, and that this future is not only peaceful and prosperous, but very exciting. The excitement now generated by competitive struggles of all sorts will be replaced by an excitement relating to the co-operative exploration of the universe. The universe is very large and very fascinating.

Those who are not quite ready to give up war, which is very addictive, will be pleased to learn there are a few major “star wars” being fought in our sector of the universe. Indeed, one is shaping up at the moment right in our neighborhood (my dreams tell me).

Dreaming the Future

Now ... I’ve got a little project in mind, and you can play (dream) along if you like. In the Journal section of this site, I’m going to post notices and notes regarding present-time persons, places, times, events relevant to the various subjects dealt with by the BE Center; but I’m also going to post notes and notices regarding future time ... post-2012 Earth.

I’ll start out this future-time notes project by using a few of my own dreams and notes regarding various important implications of the dreams. You are welcome to send us dreams and notes of your own.

So ... if you’d like to continue with this discussion/project, go now to the Journal...
